Within the HESSENTIA world, Ypsilon is a contemporary armchair built around the balance between symmetry, comfort and geometric precision. The design arises from the union of two upholstered elements, seat and backrest, which share the same shape and develop according to a harmonious, perfectly balanced composition.

The continuity between the two volumes defines an enveloping silhouette designed to accommodate the body and provide comfortable seating. The soft surfaces enter into dialogue with a base of strong design identity, itself shaped according to a Y geometry that directly recalls the name of the armchair.

The base is clad in ziricote wood, a precious species characterized by pronounced grain and deep chromatic variations. Metal details introduce a more precise and shiny element, creating a refined contrast with the warmth and expressiveness of the wood.

The relationship between upholstery, ziricote wood and metal creates a composition in which every material retains its own identity. The softness of the seat is balanced by the structural character of the base, while the symmetry of the elements gives order and recognizability to the design.

Ypsilon can be customized through different natural leather upholstery options and finishes, adapting to residential interiors, lounge areas and contemporary hospitality projects. Handmade in Italy, it interprets the armchair as a synthesis of comfort, material research and formal clarity.
